There are four main types of derivative securities:

1. Futures:

Futures contracts are a legal agreement that allows buyers & sellers to buy or sell underlying assets at some date in future at a specific rate.

Underlying assets include stocks, bonds, commodities, interest rates, market baskets and currencies.

Futures are traded on an exchange, with the contracts already standardized. In a transaction, the parties involved must buy or sell the underlying asset.

Line Chart:

Line charts are the most basic form of charts. They are composed of a single line that links the closing prices. Generally, only the closing price is graphed, present at a particular point.

This is a popular type of chart used in presentations and reports to give a very general idea of the historical and current direction.

It is clear as well as a simple way of getting a general idea of the price movement of a stock market, which is preferred by some traders.

While this kind of chart doesn't provide much insight into intraday price movements, it does consider the closing price to be more important than the open, high, or low price for a given period.

Technical Analysis:

Technical analysis as a trading discipline that is used for the evaluation of identification of trading opportunities.

It is done by analyzing the trends in statistics that are collected from trading activity as movement of price and volume.

For example, a trader might start by looking at how a security is doing over a time period.

If it's performing badly on a daily basis, the trader might then look at its long-term performance to find an optimal point of entry for the stock.
